

Recovery Remains on Track

- The synchronous global recovery remains robust, as all signs continue to point to strong and mutually beneficial growth. Indicators of investment activity remain, by and large, positive as do developments in the household sector. As a result, our forecasts remain essentially the same as we published last month. We believe that the very strong expansion in economic activity observed this year will continue into 2018. Though the flattening of the yield curve is being interpreted by some as a signal of weakening economic prospects in the United States, indicators remain strong. Moreover, the still massive balance sheets of the main central banks muddy the signals sent by changes in the yield curve.
- Our forecasts do not incorporate any impacts from the tax package currently being negotiated in the United States. We will update our forecast when there is more clarity on the final measures to be legislated. If the package does in fact lead to the significant increase in the US deficit currently estimated by a number of researchers, we may marginally increase our forecast for US growth in 2018 as well as our Federal Reserve rate call. If so, our current view is that this might pose an upside risk to our Canadian growth forecast, given that stronger growth in the US almost always leads to stronger growth in Canada.
